From the Editor's Desk

The last several months have been interesting and exciting in local history developments. On March 9, 2001, the National Civil War Naval Museum held its grand opening program in its new location off Victory Drive in Columbus. This brought to fruition the planning and hard work that began in the early 1960s to salvage the remains of two Confederate ships that rested in the mud of the Chattahoochee River below Columbus. We are happy to present a short account by Cris Calle of the retrieval effort in which he vividly captures the varied people who engaged in the risky endeavor.

Another development is our own Muscogee Genealogical Society, now approaching its twenty-fifth anniversary. Just as the centennial of the Civil War of the 1960s helped inspire the rescue of the Confederate vessels, the national bicentennial excitement of 1976 aided the formation of the "Genealogical Society of the Original Muscogee County," incorporated in the Secretary of State's office on July 9, 1976. Keep in mind that "original Muscogee" included Harris, Talbot, Marion, and Chattahoochee counties as well as the current Muscogee County. In forthcoming issues we will explore the early years and remember the people who got this organization off the ground. Society members from the beginning years are urged to contact the editor and current officers with their reminiscences and memorabilia.

This journal began its life in 1989 as a medium of local history and genealogy. It is dedicated to the Society's aim of preserving local history and educating individuals in the techniques of genealogical research. Much of the current issue fulfills that aim. The risks of uncritical reliance on published material is the subject of a review essay by your editor. The raw materials for genealogical research are presented in the marriage index and in the cemetery inventories prepared by Carol Johnson, Lyn Clements, and Lea Dowd. We hope you find all the articles of interest and use. Also, visit the Society's webpage at www.muscogeegenealogy.com.

Finally, a word to librarians and periodical holdings units. With this issue we are changing the issue numbering and time designation. Muscogiana is a biannual publication; beginning with this issue, the first issue of a volume year will be Spring, Number 1 [rather than "Summer, Numbers 1 & 2"]. The next issue in a volume year will be Fall, Number 2 [rather than "Fall, Numbers 3 & 4"]. We hope this change does not overly burden your system.

As always, the editor and the Editorial Board want your contributions of material and articles. Feel free to write to us or e-mail me directly at h-srodgers@mindspring.com.

A TRUE AND ACCURATE ACCOUNT OF THE
RAISING OF THE CSS JACKSON AND THE CSS CHATTAHOOCHEE

By

Cris Calle

(This is a revised and shortened version of a paper written by Mr. Calle in 2000 as a student at Columbus State University. Mr. Calle is currently with Vital Total Systems of Columbus.)

The Ironclad CSS Jackson

The Jackson was laid down in December, 1862, at the Confederate States Navy Yard in Columbus, Georgia.¹ At first she was a center prop vessel called the Muscogee, but after a failed launch attempt in early 1864, she was refitted to a twin screw arrangement. She was also lengthened and her name changed to the Jackson after the city in Mississippi. On December 22, 1864, she was launched successfully, but remained at the Navy Yard while being outfitted. She was several weeks from completion when Union troops invaded the city on April 16, 1865. The next day the invaders set her afire and sent her floating down the Chattahoochee. She came to rest 25 miles downstream with her bow stuck in the mud on the Alabama side.

Over the next couple of decades, she was pillaged for scrap iron.² Having come to rest with her stern at a slight angle up river, she created a hazard. Around 1910 the Army Corps of Engineers build a jetty on her to improve navigation on the Chattahoochee. At that time Gunby Jordan salvaged two of her cannons and set them on the campus of Jordan High School.

The Gunboat CSS Chattahoochee

The Chattahoochee was built at Saffold in Early County, Georgia.³ She was commissioned on January 1, 1863. A couple of times she set off down river to help break the Union blockade on the Apalachicola River but both times had to return due to mechanical failure. On May 27, 1863, her captain, Lt. Commander John Guthrie planned to go downstream to aid a boat that had just been captured by the Union. But, before a full head of steam could build, her boiler exploded. Sixteen men died in the blast and the boat sank.⁴ Frightened by the incident, many of the ship's sailors deserted the Confederate Navy.

The Chattahoochee was raised and taken to Columbus for some badly needed repairs. She was in Columbus when Wilson's Raiders approached the city. Confederate troops did not want her to fall into Yankee hands. They took her down to Broken Arrow Creek, twelve miles below Columbus, to deep water.⁵ They poured gallons of kerosene over her and cut through some water lines with an ax. As water started to fill the boat, the Confederates set her afire and escaped into the surrounding forest.

The Search

Around 1959, Joe Willman, Jr., attended a lecture given by Dr. Joseph B. Mahan.⁶ In his presentation, Mahan mentioned the possibility that the remains of some Confederate gunboats might be lurking in the waters down from Columbus. After the lecture Willman, who liked finding Civil War artifacts, talked to Mahan about the boats. He became determined to find a Confederate gunboat.

During the next couple of weeks, Willman started building a team to help him with his project. He sought out James Bush, an experienced scuba diver who had a diving club in Columbus and who had helped write the U.S. Army manual on scuba diving.⁷ Bush also knew many soldiers at Ft. Benning who were experienced divers. Bush agreed to help with the search.

Joe Willman then discussed the subject with his friend Wade Weekes.⁸ Weekes owned Dolphin Marine (located on what is now Manchester Expressway across from St. Francis Hospital); he had boats and a barge with a good-sized boom. Willman knew he needed boats to avoid the heavy forests on both sides of the Chattahoochee south of Columbus. Weekes decided to join the team.

During the summer of 1960, the search for the gunboat became a weekend activity. The men would pile their friends and family into boats and head down river where they combed the banks for any sign of wreckage. At noon they would tie the boats together for a picnic lunch.

Discovery

In early September, 1960, Weekes and Willman ran into Brother Finbar Ray, a priest at Holy Trinity in Alabama. Ray was a relentless pursuer of artifacts and had won some notoriety by finding an armor breastplate near Holy Trinity. On this particular day, Brother Finbar and a companion, Brother Matthew (also called Sebastian), were looking for arrowheads. Weekes told the clerics what they were looking for. Brother Finbar knew immediately what Weekes was talking about and led the party down river to the site where the Jackson had run into the bank almost a hundred years earlier. Success!

The men dug around on the site and found a piece of cannon. They took the piece back to Columbus where Weekes and Willman saw it fit perfectly onto one of the cannons Gunby Jordan had salvaged in 1910 and placed at Jordan High School. Later, the two men found a piece of muzzle that fit a cannon the Army Corps of Engineers had placed in the Confederate section of Linwood Cemetery in Columbus. They were now certain they had discovered the Jackson.

Salvage Operation

Willman, Weekes and Bush knew that raising the Jackson and bringing her back to Columbus would not be easy. The Jackson was located deep within the Fort Benning reservation with no roads nearby. They would need permission to get to the site and at that time the Army was cautious about having civilians moving around the base. Eventually, the Army agreed to build a road to the site. Weekes wore out his old army Willis on the muddy road and had to buy a new four-wheel drive station wagon. Weekes also brought his barge and boom down to the boat site. The men connected a huge magnet to the boom that picked up many artifacts from the bottom. James Bush took his old tugboat down to the site and it provided an indispensable staging platform.

Rough terrain was not the only problem for the salvage crew. Dam construction on the river at Ft. Gaines meant that the water level on the Chattahoochee would soon rise 50 feet. The boat had to be retrieved while it was still accessible. Then there was the problem of money. Weekes and Willman brought in their friend, Clyde Armour, an attorney in Columbus, to help in their quest for money for the salvage operation. They created an organization, the Confederate Gunboat Salvage Association. Clyde Armour then went to the Georgia Historical Commission in Atlanta which agreed to donate $25,000 to raise the Jackson after Armour showed them a mounted bolt and nut from the vessel.

With money now in hand, the Salvage Association hired John Stewart, a dredge specialist, as a full time superintendent of the operation. He proved invaluable. They next rented an old dredge from the Calhoun Sand and Gravel company. The company sent along a short, wiry, black man they called "the Pygmy". According to Weekes, the Pygmy knew just where to kick the motor to keep it running.⁹ As the operators were dredging around the boat, volunteers would stand by the dredge's discharge pipe and listen for clanking. If they heard anything come through the pipe, they would turn off the pump and sift the discharge. Needless to say, it was not a professional archaeological process. But underwater archaeology was yet in its infancy; the precision equipment that is used today was not widely available in the early 1960s.

The excitement of the find brought a lot of volunteers to the Salvage Association and during the fall of 1960 and the spring of 1961 the men worked hard dredging the area around the boat. Set backs happened. Sometime in 1961, Willman purchased an old army surplus amphibious vehicle from the Knight Salvage yard in Columbus. He got it down to the wreck site but the vehicle's engine could not fight the strong current. When the engine failed, Willman drifted until the old "Duck" got lodged on the bank near the Omaha Bridge. He simply left it there and hitched a ride back to Columbus.

The Georgia Historical Commission was intent on making the ironclad part of the world's first Confederate Naval Museum. The secretary of the Commission, Mrs. Mary Jewett, was a descendant of a Confederate naval captain. She was determined to walk the decks of a Confederate gunboat. In the summer of 1961, she drove from Atlanta to the salvage site, changed into her swimsuit in the car, donned a white cap and went down to the waterline to walk on the Jackson.

But the Jackson remained stuck. Later that summer the group decided to try old underground gasoline tanks to float the stern section. Weekes had a friend, Tom Cunningham, whose father owned Amoco-Cunningham Oil and who would let the salvagers have some of his old storage tanks. To expedite freeing the boat, the group decided to blast the boat in half, sink the gas tanks next to the stern, tie them on with heavy cables, then pump the water out of the tanks. With luck the stern would break free of the mud and float to the top. Brother Finbar and Brother Sebastian of Holy Trinity volunteered to do the blasting. The clerics had some experience with dynamite (not all of it successful: Brother Sebastian had lost an arm and an eye to explosives); this time the blast went off without a hitch and the boat was cut cleanly in two. Now James Bush and his diving crew took on the hazardous task of boring under the stern and passing cables through for the tanks. If the wreck listed at all, the men could have been trapped.¹⁰ Despite all the risky work, the gas tank project was a failure. Both parts of the Jackson remained stuck. It was time for something else.

James Woodruff, Jr., used his influence to have the Army clear off the area around the bow of the Jackson.¹¹ In preparation for the rising water level, the banks of the Chattahoochee were being stripped of trees, but clearing the area around the bow proved treacherous. The Alabama clay was unforgiving. At one point a heavy army bulldozer slipped precariously over the bank and almost into the river. However, the Army built better access roads to the site and allowed a junior officer, Lt. Tucker, to work full time on the project. (With a clean-shaven head, he was a bull of a man in excellent physical condition. He would dive around the boat without a wet suit in November and on more than one occasion stayed under so long his nose bled.) With the area clear, the salvage team tried a new flotation scheme.

One of the salvage group's members, George Trussell, persuaded Gunby Jordan to help find some pontoons. These were taken to the site and the cables previously put under the stern were tightly attached to the pontoons. The salvage group got the ready cooperation of Georgia Power Company in releasing water from the dam above Columbus. The men learned just how long it would take a change up river to affect the water level at the salvage site. Georgia Power could raise or lower the river level by as little as one foot. It only took a phone call from Wade Weekes to get the dam controls into action.

As work on the Jackson proceeded, an air of giddy excitement developed around the salvage operation. Dr. Joe Mahan, whose vision had inspired the project, was nearly overcome with "boat fever." He went to Ft. Benning and asked that all the pilots flying over the area be on the lookout for other sunken boats on the riverbed. His request paid off on September 28, 1961, when Lt. Col. Charles Walrath, flying a Super Piper Cub over the Chattahoochee, spotted the outline of a boat at Broken Arrow Creek. He relayed the information to Mahan and the next day Mahan, Weekes, and Walrath set out to pinpoint the wreck. The trio went in Weekes' 8-foot johnboat to investigate the swiftly flowing water around Broken Arrow Creek. When they made for the bank to take a rest, Mahan grabbed onto something just below the surface in an effort to stabilize the boat. After they sat there for a while, Weekes finally realized that what Mahan was holding onto was the propeller of the missing gunboat! They had found the CSS Chattahoochee.

Now there were two Confederate boats to save, but the Jackson took priority. On November 9, 1961, heavy rains caused the Chattahoochee to reach flood levels. When the waters receded the salvage crew went out to inspect for damage. To their delight the stern section of the Jackson had broken free in the flood and stayed attached to the pontoons. She was up at last! Now to bring her upstream. As James Bush prepared his tug for the journey he found the stern section still too heavy. He decided to reduce weight and drag by cutting off the Jackson's large propellers. As Bush fired up his acetylene torch for the task, his wife left the site certain he would be blown to kingdom-come.¹² The operation succeeded and the tug, with the Jackson's stern in tow, moved slowly up river.

The tug labored along until mid-December 1961 when the stern got hung up on Jenny's Island. It became clear that different transportation was required. At this point the Army offered some bridge boats to carry the stern to Columbus. Facilitating the action, Georgia Power raised the water level. Although some of the Army's bridge boats were lost in the operation, in the spring of 1962, the stern of the Jackson arrived at the river bank near its future home.¹³

It took months to bring the stern section on to dry land. A lot of people helped in this difficult task. The Georgia National Guard, led by Captain Ben Penton, had already been involved, but now anyone with a wrecker truck joined the effort. The boat had to be dragged over logs and telephone poles to a site on Victory Drive on June 20, 1962.¹⁴ Finally, on July 25, Governor Ernest Vandiver and James W. Woodruff, Jr., broke ground for the world's first Confederate Naval Museum. Bad weather forced the ceremony indoors where Governor Vandiver received his commission as a Confederate Navy Admiral.¹⁵

Governor Vandiver proved a loyal supporter of the next phase: raising the bow of the Jackson and bringing it to Columbus. By August, the Georgia Historical Commission had used up the original $25,000 for the project. James W. Woodruff, Jr., convinced the Muscogee County Commission and the Columbus City Commission to donate $10,000 each to the effort, while the Confederate Salvage Association would raise an additional $10,000. On December 6, 1962, Governor Vandiver agreed to match the $30,000 raised by the others.¹⁶ The work could proceed.

The salvage crew built a cofferdam around the bow section and pumped the water out. Led by J. R. Allen, the Columbus Jaycees helped secure pontoons to the bow section. On December 30, the bow of the Jackson reached the surface.¹⁷ Unfortunately, her ram, stuck deep into the riverbank, had to be broken off and left. Like the stern in the months before, the bow had trouble passing Jenny's Island where the salvagers tied her up and waited for higher water. While tied up, some vandals cut the ropes; the section floated down stream and got restuck on the bank. A great effort retrieved the bow; on July 28, 1963, it was reunited with the stern.¹⁸

The CSS Chattahoochee

Rescuing the Chattahoochee proved as difficult and as filled with mishaps as the salvage of the Jackson. When the gunboat Chattahoochee was first located the water level was low enough to reveal the outline of the vessel. Divers now marked her outline with milk jugs before running cables underneath the boat.¹⁹ In the meanwhile, the salvage group brought in the snagboat Montgomery, captained by Bernie Colvin. Capt. Colvin used the snagboat's buckets to gently lift mud and debris from around and off the Chattahoochee. Then, as the snagboat's boom tried to lift the wreckage, one of the cables cut the gunboat in half; the stern section broke free while the bow stayed in the mud (it was never recovered). As the Montgomery returned to homeport for repairs, the floating stern of the gunboat posed a hazard on the river. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers briefly considered destroying the remains. Eventually, the Montgomery returned to the work. Once more, the big boom gently lifted and nudged the stern section; just as the task neared completion, the boom broke and fell over the stern section. James Woodruff, Jr., had only moments before been standing beneath the boom. Fortunately, no one was injured. By late 1964, the stern of the Chattahoochee joined the Jackson at the museum site. This concluded the difficult task, begun in 1960, of retrieving the remains of the Confederate vessels from the Chattahoochee River.

TWO AUTHORS ON THE COMER FAMILY OF GEORGIA AND ALABAMA

A Review Essay

by

Hugh I. Rodgers

Carolyn Tamblyn, John Comer and His Descendants, Primarily Those of Rebecca Moss and Samuel Comer. Auburn, AL: by the author, 2000. (Order information from the author at 706 Hollon Avenue, Auburn, AL 36830.)

Anne Kendrick Walker, Braxton Bragg Comer: His Family Tree from Virginia's Colonial Days. Richmond: Dietz Press, 1947. (Out of print.)

Over half a century ago Anne Kendrick Walker of Eufaula, Alabama, published a lavishly produced book on the ancestry of Alabama governor Braxton Bragg Comer. The author projected a lofty goal for the work with her personal inscription in the copy she placed in the Bradley Library of Columbus, Georgia: "To Loretto Lamar Chappel--As a small contribution to her great purpose--the linking of the historical heritages of Alabama and Georgia." The press of Montgomery and Birmingham hailed the book's publication and predicted its popular appeal.¹ The massive tome now rests in all the major and many minor libraries of the southeast including the archives of both Georgia and Alabama. It has been cited and quoted by local historians and genealogists in both states and its research and conclusions accepted without question by all but a few at the time and since.² Now, however, by careful and painstaking research, Carolyn Tamblyn of Auburn, Alabama, has documented serious flaws, omissions, improper use of documents, and erroneous linkages by Walker in the Comer book. Since the work has been so widely used and cited it is worthwhile in the interest of sound biography and genealogy that Walker's book and Tamblyn's critique be examined.

Who was Anne Kendrick Walker and what sort of writer was she? According to her biographical sketch in Thomas McAdory Owen's dictionary of notable Alabamians, she was born Annie Kendrick Walker on 19 November 1880.³ (Years later, after moving to New York, she used the name "Anne".) She entered life on a plantation at Chunnenugee Ridge in Bullock County, the daughter of CSA Colonel John Absolam and Eliza Jane (Kendrick) Walker.⁴ When she was a child the family moved to a home on Cotton Street in Eufaula.⁵

Annie Kendrick Walker received all the advantages of her family's economic and social position, being educated by private tutors and spending two years at Miss L. Graham Crozier's School for Young Ladies in Knoxville, Tennessee, where the emphasis was on French language and culture.

By circumstance of birth and education, Annie Kendrick Walker was well acquainted with the political and social elite of Alabama, including the powerful Comer family of Barbour County. She naturally absorbed much of the area's social history and lore as she grew up in Eufaula. Her contacts widened when in the late 1890s the Walkers moved to Birmingham, where the Comers also had important industrial and commercial interests. One of her childhood friends, Janie Sutherlin Smith, was married to Edward Ware Barrett, of the Birmingham Age Herald. This connection gave her the opportunity in 1898 to begin her career as a journalist, first in the women's department and then as a feature writer for Mr. Barrett's newspaper. After about ten years on the Birmingham paper, Miss Walker decided upon a literary career in New York.⁶

Unlike the typical young artist or writer who moves anonymously from the hinterland to modest lodging in the great city in search of success and fame, Annie Kendrick Walker and her mother went to live with friends in an historic mansion in Riverdale-on-the-Hudson. Even here, however, Walker kept in touch with her Barbour County associations as she crafted a book on the Shorter family and its houses and gardens.⁷ She also helped her mother compile her memoir of life on an Alabama plantation in the ante-bellum era.⁸ In the meanwhile, the Walkers' socially prominent friends provided useful contacts with New York's social and business circles. The young writer soon busied herself writing publicity features, fashion notes, and war bond appeals. B. Altman and Company brought Miss Walker on to their staff as fashion writer where her knowledge of French could be utilized. She contributed reviews and notes about the arts and historic persons and places to various journals. She briefly worked for Columbia University compiling a literary index and the New York Herald Tribune employed her as editor of club news.⁹

Miss Walker interested herself in social questions and was something of a "progressive" with regard to race and labor problems. In letters to the New York Times she sympathetically described a commencement ceremony at the "Riverdale Colored Orphanage" noting how the students demonstrated the capacity of the Negro race for cultural and educational advancement.¹⁰ In a mildly worded article, Walker wrote that department store workers needed "the benefits arising from organized leadership" and thought these "thousands of unorganized workers" would be improved by the ideals of the labor movement.¹¹ Throughout the 1920s and early 1930s, she contributed short notes and letters to the Times on various topics.¹²

Walker could not be considered a serious social reformer. The major result of her involvement in New York clubs and organizations was her election as president of the "Society of Alabamians in New York" in 1929 and 1930, a position she relished. In 1931, she undertook in a lengthy letter to the Times, to instruct the uninitiated in the proper terminology for persons of Alabama origins: "Alabamians", not "Alabamans." This prompted a reply from one FMK, who archly queried, "Did the Times omit the 'i' from Miss Walker's first name because of the additional 'i' in Alabamians?"¹³ Miss Walker provided no response and in fact her name does not again appear in the Times index. Her venture into the wider literary world seems to have concluded rather limply.

Returning to her roots just before World War II, Walker began research for her book on Barbour County. Eventually, she came back to Eufaula to live in the Kendall mansion, the ancestral home of her friend Jennie Kendall Dean; the house was featured in one of Miss Walker's works.¹⁴ Anne Kendrick Walker spent the rest of her career in her native state where she enjoyed an elevated reputation as a writer on historical and genealogical topics. She was chairwoman of the Writers Division of the Alabama Federation of Women's Clubs and became president of the Alabama Pen Women in 1952. She wrote most of her books in the 1940s and 1950s. All of them received glowing commendations in the local and state press. In its issue of August 9, 1953, the Birmingham News named her one of "Alabama's Gracious Ladies". The Mobile Press-Register and the Montgomery Advertiser wrote generous feature articles about her life and work during the 1950s.¹⁵

Anne Kendrick Walker died at the Barbour County Nursing Home in Eufaula, on March 22, 1966. The Eufaula Tribune carried both a news story and an editorial about the "gracious lady" with the "gifted pen", whose passing seemed to sever an important personal tie to the regional past.¹⁶

What kind of work did this genteel writer produce? Walker's books are mainly family histories, genealogy, biography, and local history.¹⁷ Although she did not have any formal training as a historian, Walker wrote creatively, and as one commentator put it, "with grace, charm, and common sense." One person who knew her well described her perseverance and hours spent in research. With her somewhat romantic tastes, Walker had a flair for the dramatic, a keen eye for the colorful character, and a penchant for the amusing anecdote. Her prose, drenched with nostalgia for the Old South and the Lost Cause, obviously appealed to the prominent personalities and historical committees that commissioned her books. What reception awaited her work?

An academic, Emily Calcott, reviewed Backtracking in Barbour County for the Alabama Historical Quarterly.¹⁸ While noting the author "writes...with romantic enthusiasm", Calcott concluded the work was not just a "series of frothy essays". She pointed to the use of documents, letters, diaries, account books, old maps and interviews which supported the study. The public press was less restrained. The Birmingham News (25 May 1941) in its notice of the book praised its former staff writer. Similarly, the volume on Russell County received accolades from the Montgomery Advertiser (4 June 1950) which described it as "engagingly written" and "competent". Walker only briefly alluded to the World War II era and made no mention of crime and corruption in Phenix City and Russell County. Both the Montgomery and Birmingham papers applauded the genealogy of Braxton Bragg Comer as a "valued addition to Alabama historical works" with "evidence of careful and extensive research."¹⁹

Walker's most serious foray into public affairs was her study Tuskegee and the Black Belt. She dedicated it to her friend, Marie Bankhead Owen, formidable grande dame of Alabama historical research. The Montgomery Advertiser cautiously praised Walker's progressive views and described the book as "intensely inspiring to both the white and black races."²⁰ Although advanced for its time, the book, read today, seems impossibly patronizing. But when Virginius Dabney reviewed the book for the New York Times he praised the work: "If all Southerners would exhibit Miss Walker's intelligent awareness of the issues that are troubling the Negro today (and fortunately more and more of them are doing so), the country would be nearer a partial solution of the race problem than it is."²¹

However, a scholar's lens trained on the work revealed some flaws which the writer's benign sentiments barely covered. Dr. Douglas L. Hunt, an English professor at Birmingham-Southern College before becoming editorial writer for the Birmingham News, in his critical analysis of Tuskegee, remarked that "all of these subjects are handled with what passes for the paraphernalia of scholarship, but which in reality is but a superficial skimming of the surface of these vital problems." He found her references "careless". By calling attention to the work of Gunnar Myrdal, whose American Dilemma had appeared that same year, he highlighted the limitations of Walker's history of racial developments in the United States.²²

In sum, Walker was a gifted writer and amateur historian. She could tell a good story complete with candelabra, the rustle of silk, and the flash of scarlet lining on a gray cape. The clotted prose of the typical academic historian along with his cumbersome scholarly apparatus was not her style at all. Her works on Barbour County and Russell County are leisurely and entertaining narratives and are not without value almost sixty years after publication. But in some cases, it is clear that she took short-cuts, only superficially researched her subject, made unsubstantiated assumptions and drew faulty inferences. A telling example of the weaknesses of her approach is provided by her genealogical study of the Comer family.

As might be expected in a work of this sort, Walker dealt only briefly with the Comers' weighty role in the Alabama and, indeed, southeastern, textile industry, railroading, and commercial agriculture: the 30,000 acre plantation in Barbour County, the Central of Georgia Railroad, and Avondale Mills. She paid somewhat more attention to the family's political activity. Walker began in Virginia with John Comer, Sr. (d. c1766), his son, Samuel Comer (d. 1788), and continued with the latter's children, primarily the three sons who eventually moved to Georgia: James Comer (d. 1837), Anderson Comer (d. 1813), and Hugh Moss Comer (d. 1836). The bulk of the volume is devoted to the descendants of Hugh Moss Comer's son, John Fletcher Comer of Barbour County, AL. For that hundred year period, roughly 1840 to 1940, Walker was, of course, on familiar ground; she had the ample family archives as well as county and state documents to support her work. The problematic portion of the book comes early on in her treatment of the Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia episodes in the family's history. It is to this section that Carolyn Tamblyn turns her attention.

Carolyn Tamblyn holds a graduate degree (Ed.D.) and, although not a historian, is well-versed in research techniques. She has done genealogical research as a serious avocation for several years. One wishes Tamblyn had written a strong narrative accompaniment to her genealogical study; the work could also be improved with a better format of source citation. But these are small caveats. It will not be possible in this review to do more than indicate the rich documentation (much of it fully quoted) that buttresses her work. She followed a two-fold approach to research on the early Comers. She exhaustively explored the public records (deeds, wills, estate settlements, court documents, church registers, the press) of the several counties in Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, where Comers and allied families lived. In a second avenue of research, unlike Walker, Tamblyn investigated the collateral lines of succeeding generations of John Comer's descendants. It took Tamblyn the better part of ten years of laborious digging to unscramble many of these relationships while correcting errors made by Walker.

An example is Walker's treatment of Samuel Comer's daughter, Rebecca, who married William Clay in 1788 in Virginia. Walker asserts: "The Clays remained in Virginia--Halifax County, and Mrs. Clay died in 1789."²³ As Tamblyn shows, and it could have easily been found by Walker, William and Rebecca Clay moved to Tennessee, had a large family and as late as 1843 the still-lively Rebecca was approved for a pension on the basis of her husband's service in the Revolutionary War.²⁴ Another strange error made by Walker was her insistence that of the five females named in the will of Samuel Comer (1788), only one, Rebecca, was his daughter while the other four were nieces, daughters of Samuel's brother, John Comer, Jr (d. 1757).²⁵ This will, as printed by Walker, omits one daughter, Nancy Comer (a case of sloppy note-taking by Walker?), but in it Samuel plainly calls all the girls "daughters". Tamblyn cites irrefutable records in addition that prove them to be his and his wife's (Elizabeth Moss Comer's) daughters. She concludes: "There is no credible reason to believe that the persons Samuel Comer called his 'daughters' were not, in fact, his daughters."²⁶

Another nearly impenetrable thicket of errors compounded by Walker concerns the family of Elizabeth Moss (b.1730, New Kent County, VA, d. 1790, Charlotte Co., VA), who became the wife of Samuel Comer.²⁷ The Mosses of colonial Virginia existed in many branches, so pitfalls await the unwary researcher. Walker misidentified the parents of Elizabeth's mother (she was not the daughter of John King), and she confused two generations of men named James Moss, hopelessly mixing the life spans of the two. Tamblyn quotes court and church records which help clarify the Moss relationships.²⁸ Tamblyn also demonstrates that Walker misinterpreted a financial document signed by Samuel Comer and Elizabeth Moss Comer as a "divorce" settlement. It was not.²⁹ Another Moss name that Walker introduced was that of William Moss (1778-1835), a pallbearer at the 1799 funeral of George Washington. Walker apparently thought to add distinction by association; this William Moss was of a later generation than Elizabeth Moss Comer and had no known connection to her family.³⁰

In her scant three-page discussion of two of the three sons of Samuel and Elizabeth Moss Comer, who eventually moved to Jones County, Georgia, Walker omitted any mention of the sojourn of James Comer and

Anderson Comer in Granville and Wake counties North Carolina. Walker asserted the men were unmarried when they arrived in Georgia (in the late 1780s, not the 1790s). Actually, James Comer married Elizabeth Clements in 1779 in Granville County, NC, and Anderson Comer, who had married his first wife (name unknown) in Virginia, married his second wife, Nancy Burford, in 1783, also in Granville County. Walker confused James Comer's marital circumstances in several ways. She stated that James Comer's first wife was Frances Finch, by whom he had one son, his second wife, unknown, by whom he had 13 children, and a third wife, Nancy Harper who presented him with 13 more. As Tamblyn documents, his first wife was Elizabeth Clements (1779), his second Frances Finch (1794), and his third, Nancy Harper (1798). It is possible, but doubtful, that James Comer fathered 27 children by his wives. Walker names only two of this allegedly numerous progeny.³¹ One of Walker's more amusing errors concerns James Comer's age at death: Walker stated that he "died in 1837 at 107 years of age".³² This would put his birth year at 1730, the same year his then infant mother, Elizabeth Moss, was christened at St. Peter's Parish, New Kent County, VA!

About another Comer brother, Anderson Comer, Walker made even more egregious errors. She got his name wrong: Walker identified him as "John Anderson Comer" even though all extant records (thoroughly delineated by Tamblyn) in Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, show his name as "Anderson Comer."³³ Walker further confused Anderson Comer with his son, also named Anderson, even to the extent of misidentifying the marriage of Anderson Comer, Jr., in 1826 to Maria Rhymes as the marriage of the senior Anderson Comer.³⁴ The elder Anderson was not even alive in 1826, having died intestate in Jones County in 1813. The settlement of his vast estate took several years and produced reams of documents in Jones, Greene, and Hancock counties, Georgia.³⁵ Walker examined none of these. Needless to say, Walker made no effort to properly identify the eleven children of Anderson Comer, Sr.; Tamblyn does.³⁶

Having briefly, but with numerous errors, treated two of the Comer men, Walker turned to the third brother, Hugh Moss Comer (1760-1836) and dilated at length upon his personal and public activities in Jones and surrounding counties of Georgia. With steady realibility from this point, Walker focused upon Hugh Moss Comer's son, John Fletcher Comer, and his off-spring in Barbour County, AL. One of these was the industrialist and governor, Braxton Bragg Comer (b. 1848, d. 1927), the main subject of the work. This portion of the work is well-crafted with numerous portraits and photographs. Since this branch of the family had commissioned the book, it no doubt accounts for Walker's short treatment of James and Anderson Comer. It does not excuse her incredibly faulty research on them and on the earlier history of the family in Virginia. Superficial reviewers in the public press who complimented Walker on her "careful and extensive research" may be forgiven their lack of insight. More blameworthy are those genealogists and local historians who ignored for over fifty years the serious flaws contained in Walker's book.

As a writer, Anne Kendrick Walker was deeply embedded in the circumstances of her times and her social milieu. She made positive contributions as an author but was never able to transcend the limitations of the genteel school of historical and genealogical research. But more seriously, the charges of superficiality and careless documentation, which arose around Tuskegee, may clearly be applied to her book on the Comers. Of course, such limitations and flaws are not unique to Walker but can be found in dozens of similar works written several decades ago. Carolyn Tamblyn's study provides ample warning to a newer generation of readers and novice researchers of the dangers of relying upon such books. The historical truth about a family is always more interesting and satisfying than any poorly documented or romanticized account. Very often it is difficult to get at, but Tamblyn's study shows how the truth may be uncovered.

However, in Who Was Who in America with World Notables, Volume 5 1969-1973, p. 751, the birth year is given as 1876. In the U S Census, 1880, Alabama, Barbour County (Microfilm, T 9, R 2), vol. 2, E. D. 7, Sheet 9, line 79, she is listed in her father's household as eight years old, indicating a birth year of 1872. The effort to conceal her true birth year may be an old-fashioned case of female vanity. Most of the details of her career may be found in Walker File, Tutwiler Collection.

⁴Jennie Kendall Dean, "A Sketch of Anne Kendrick Walker", (a typescript of 6 pages), in a Vertical File, Eufaula Carnegie Library, Eufaula, AL, hereafter cited as Dean, "Sketch". Dean gives John Walker's Civil War rank as "captain"; Anne Walker's entry in the Dictionary of Alabama Biography shows him a "colonel".
